"Education is a progressive discovery of our own ignorance".
Will Durant.

Some people consider that when you're getting education you're able to discover your own knowledge, which can also mean the level of your own ignorance. The problem of the theme is the ignorance which we open for ourselves while learning something.

As for me, I agree with the author. Firstly, because we can prove that while practicing. For example the more I learn history of my country, the more I discover so many things which I didn't know before learning. And secondly, because it's obvious for me; our ignorance is limitless, because we can't know everything about everything. There will always be something that we don't know. And the only way to find out things that you don't know is studying. And studying hard. Because even if you're good at one or two disciplines, you're not good at other ones. You're ignorant at them.

Summarising everything above I'd like to say that W. Durant is right. And I believe that his words are calling us for learning and ^{just} making our minds wider. Which means making our ignorance level lower.
