Should students have a long
Summer holiday or should terms be longer?

It is common knowledge that a school year is made up of two different periods - school terms and school holidays. During the first one, students have to attend school and study, while the other one gives them an opportunity to rest and relax, and many people argue whether students should have a long Summer holiday or longer terms.

The ones who support the decision of making terms longer often point out that it will give the students more time to learn or to fix up their grades, and while that is true, you could also learn on holidays, the only difference is that nobody forces you to do that. But speaking from my experience, only a few students would dedicate their "sacred" break time to studying during holidays.

On the contrary, most students spend their summer holidays enjoying themselves - hanging out with friends, doing sports, playing computer games, etc. Some people even use their time to fix their mental health that could've been damaged from stressing out too much or overworking during school terms.

To my belief, the school system should stay the way it is right now, since the terms already give enough time to learn and the summer holidays provide enough time for rest, at least, in my case.
